30 Young Europeans Unite in Warsaw to Build Cultural Bridges

Erasmus+ youth exchange brings together participants from Spain, Poland, and France for five days of intercultural dialogue and anti-discrimination workshops

Warsaw, Poland -- May 18, 2025 -- Thirty young people from three European countries gathered in Warsaw, Poland, from May 14 to 18, 2025, for a landmark youth exchange under the Erasmus+ project "Cultural Bridges: Strengthening Interculturality and Social Inclusion among Youth." The five-day programme brought together participants from Spain, Poland, and France for intensive workshops, intercultural activities, and collaborative learning focused on combating racism and discrimination.

The exchange, organised under the Erasmus+ KA210-YOU programme, is part of a broader partnership between three youth organisations: Associacio Juvenil Ndiatiguia Joves Units (Spain), which serves as the project coordinator, UGPA POLSKA (Poland), and Un Geste pour l'Avenir (France). Together, these organisations are working to equip young Europeans with the skills and awareness needed to promote social inclusion in their communities.

"Cultural Bridges is about more than a single event. It is about creating a generation of young people who understand that diversity is a strength, not a barrier," said a representative of Associacio Juvenil Ndiatiguia Joves Units. "In Warsaw, we saw 30 participants arrive as strangers and leave as ambassadors for intercultural dialogue."

Over the course of five days, participants took part in non-formal education workshops addressing anti-racism, anti-discrimination, and social inclusion. Highlights included an intercultural night where each national group shared traditions, food, music, and stories from their communities, as well as collaborative exercises designed to break down stereotypes and build mutual understanding.

"The Warsaw exchange demonstrated the power of face-to-face encounters," said a representative of UGPA POLSKA, the hosting partner. "When young people from different backgrounds live, learn, and create together, prejudices dissolve naturally."

A representative of Un Geste pour l'Avenir added: "Our participants returned to France with a renewed commitment to fighting discrimination in their local contexts. The experience gave them practical tools and, just as importantly, lasting friendships across borders."

The Cultural Bridges project continues with awareness campaign activities in all three partner countries, aiming to multiply the impact of the Warsaw exchange by reaching wider audiences through publications, social media, and community events.

What I Learned About Myself by Living with 29 Strangers from 3 Countries

A participant's reflection on the Cultural Bridges youth exchange in Warsaw

I will be honest: when I boarded the plane to Warsaw, I was terrified. Not of flying, not of Poland, but of spending five full days with 29 people I had never met, most of whom did not speak my language. I had signed up for the Cultural Bridges exchange because it sounded interesting on paper -- an Erasmus+ project about interculturality and social inclusion. What I did not expect was that it would change the way I see myself.

Day one: the awkward beginning

We arrived at the venue in Warsaw on May 14, a mix of young people from Spain, France, and Poland. The first hours were exactly as uncomfortable as you would imagine. We smiled too much, spoke too loudly in our own languages, and clustered with the people we already knew. I remember thinking, "Five days of this?"

But then the facilitators from our three partner organisations -- Associacio Juvenil Ndiatiguia Joves Units from Spain, UGPA POLSKA from Poland, and Un Geste pour l'Avenir from France -- started the first workshop. It was a simple name game, then a mapping exercise where we placed ourselves on an imaginary map of Europe drawn on the floor. Suddenly, we were laughing. Suddenly, the clusters dissolved.

The workshop that made me uncomfortable (in the best way)

On the second day, we did an exercise about privilege and discrimination. We stood in a line, and the facilitators read statements: "Take a step forward if you have never been stopped by police because of how you look." "Take a step back if you have ever been mocked for your accent." By the end, we were spread across the room, and the silence was louder than any speech about inequality I had ever heard.

That exercise broke something open. In the discussion that followed, people shared stories I will carry with me for the rest of my life. A participant from Poland talked about what it feels like to be a young person from an immigrant family in a country that does not always welcome difference. A participant from France described the casual racism she encounters in her neighbourhood. A Spanish participant spoke about growing up between two cultures and never feeling fully accepted by either.

I realised that my own experience of exclusion, which I had always minimised, was valid. And I realised that listening -- truly listening -- to someone else's story is itself an act of solidarity.

Intercultural night: the heart of the exchange

If I had to choose one moment that captured the spirit of Cultural Bridges, it would be the intercultural night on day three. Each country prepared food, music, dances, and presentations about their culture. The Spanish group brought the energy with music and stories about community traditions. The Polish group taught us folk dances and served homemade dishes that made everyone go back for seconds. The French group shared songs and a presentation about the diversity within France that challenged every stereotype in the room.

But the real magic happened after the formal programme ended. We stayed up talking until two in the morning -- in broken English, with hand gestures, with translation apps, with laughter filling the gaps where words failed. I had a conversation with someone from Poland about our shared love of basketball, and with someone from France about what home means when you belong to more than one place. These were not small-talk conversations. These were the kind of conversations you have when barriers have been removed.

What I brought home

On the last day, we sat in a circle and each shared one word that summed up the experience. The words people chose -- "family," "hope," "courage," "belonging" -- told the story better than any report could.

I came home with a phone full of new contacts, a suitcase full of small gifts from my new friends, and a head full of ideas. But more than that, I came home with a different understanding of myself. I learned that I am braver than I thought. I learned that my story matters. I learned that 30 people from 3 countries, speaking different languages and carrying different histories, can build something real in just five days.

The Cultural Bridges project, co-funded by the European Union through Erasmus+, gave me that. And now, through this awareness campaign, I want to give it forward. If you ever get the chance to take part in a youth exchange, say yes. Say yes even if you are terrified. Especially if you are terrified.

Because that is where the growth happens.

Why Non-Formal Education Is the Key to Fighting Racism Among Youth

How the Cultural Bridges project proves that lived experience outperforms lectures in building an anti-racist generation

Europe has a racism problem, and traditional education alone is not solving it. Despite decades of inclusion policies and anti-discrimination legislation, survey after survey shows that young Europeans continue to experience and witness racism, xenophobia, and social exclusion in their daily lives. The EU Fundamental Rights Agency reported that discrimination based on ethnic origin remains widespread, and that young people from minority backgrounds are disproportionately affected.

So what is missing? At the Cultural Bridges project, we believe the answer lies in a shift from talking about inclusion to practising it -- and non-formal education is the method that makes this possible.

Beyond the classroom

Formal education teaches young people that racism is wrong. Non-formal education lets them feel why. There is a profound difference between reading a textbook chapter on discrimination and standing in a room with 29 peers from Spain, Poland, and France, doing an exercise that reveals how privilege operates in your own life. The first informs. The second transforms.

During the Cultural Bridges youth exchange in Warsaw in May 2025, 30 young participants from three countries spent five days engaged in non-formal education workshops focused on anti-racism, intercultural dialogue, and social inclusion. The programme, co-funded by the European Union through Erasmus+ (KA210-YOU), was designed and delivered by three partner organisations -- Associacio Juvenil Ndiatiguia Joves Units (Spain), UGPA POLSKA (Poland), and Un Geste pour l'Avenir (France) -- each bringing years of experience in youth work and community engagement.

What distinguished these workshops from a university seminar was participation. There were no passive listeners. Every activity required young people to share, reflect, debate, create, and collaborate across cultural and linguistic boundaries. The learning was embodied, emotional, and collective.

Why this matters for European anti-discrimination policy

The European Commission's Anti-Racism Action Plan 2020-2025 recognised the importance of education and youth engagement in building a more inclusive Europe. The Erasmus+ programme, through actions like KA210-YOU, translates that recognition into practice by funding grassroots projects that bring young people together across borders.

Projects like Cultural Bridges are not peripheral to the anti-racism agenda. They are central to it. They create the conditions under which young people develop the intercultural competences, critical thinking, and empathy that no policy document can legislate into existence.

When a young person from a majority background shares a meal, a conversation, and a creative project with a peer who has experienced racial discrimination, something shifts. Stereotypes lose their hold. Abstract concepts like "structural racism" become personal and urgent. And crucially, young people discover their own agency: they leave the exchange not just aware of the problem, but equipped and motivated to act.

A call to invest

The Cultural Bridges awareness campaign exists because we believe these experiences should not remain private. They must be shared, multiplied, and amplified. Every young person who participated in the Warsaw exchange is now a potential advocate for inclusion in their community, their school, their workplace.

But we must be clear-eyed: one project, however successful, cannot dismantle systemic racism. What it can do is demonstrate a model that works. Non-formal education, transnational youth mobility, and sustained partnership between grassroots organisations across Europe represent one of the most effective tools available for building an anti-racist generation.

We call on policymakers, funding bodies, and youth organisations to increase investment in non-formal education programmes that prioritise intercultural encounter. The evidence is clear. The methodology is proven. The young people are ready. What remains is the political will to scale what works.

The Cultural Bridges project is co-funded by the European Union through the Erasmus+ programme. It is proof that when you bring young people together, give them the right tools, and trust them to learn from one another, they will build the inclusive Europe that our continent needs.
